Considering that the Beta of Aperture 2 was put out a year ago, is it fair to expect a Final Release any time soon? I guess it is. While the beta focused on fixes and tweaks, the Final release has been renamed Aperture 2 and Adobe has put out some big changes. The change over to Aperture 2 has taken some getting used to. Aperture 2 makes the assumption that you wish to get creative control back in your hands. This is why there is an absence of File Handling options as well as Smart Collections. In the new version, there is no "File Browser" window, just a flippy sidebar along the left hand side of the screen, with the various Aperture tools it is designed for. In the Aperture 2 UI, in the tab/window over on the left side, you get back to your tools: New Shots, Followup/Organize, and Metadata. It is no surprise that so much has been changed. Aperture 2 still has a large feature set, but it feels a lot different. The Take Outflow specific to Live View has been removed, though the same functionality is in the Aperture 2 Take Application. It is puzzling that the Take Application is missing, and Outflow is there, but that it's not available in the Aperture 2 version. It's been removed, so it must have been deprecated for greater purpose, no? Perhaps one of Aperture 2 key features is its preference for either a flat or cavernous approach. Just take a look at this screenshot of 16-bit preview from the new version (emphasis on Preview). This change also affects a number of features; there is not a bright-mode, the color-range for the Preview borders has changed, and there is no use for multiple Histograms (showing raw/RGB/exposure/etc.) unless you want to witness the multiple histogram effect. I suppose it is done to make Aperture 2 user-friendly.
